

MRI, or Magnetic Resonance Imaging, is the process of using a magnetic field and radio waves to take images. To ensure the safety of all occupants and to allow for proper equipment function, it's important that no magnetic materials be installed or brought into the space. In other words, all materials must be nonferrous (non-magnetic).

Air distribution products are often constructed of various metal parts and pieces, so it is important that only those products which are deemed MRI compliant by the manufacturer are specified. Krueger MRI safe products use aluminum, which is the most common and readily available nonferrous material.

Listed below are a variety of MRI compliant products. Notice that many are without accessories or other added items. This is because parts or pieces of those items may involve magnetic materials. For questions about the products or their MRI application, please reach out to our application engineering team.
